Contemporary Scandinavia: Politics and History

Course description:

The course will deal with a number of basic topics pertaining to the Scandinavian societies in a comparative framework whenever such an approach is feasible. A tentative list of basic broad topics includes the following: Socioeconomic structural changes, ideological developments, and the emergence and role of political parties, popular movements and interest organizations; the functioning of popular representation; nature and functioning of the party systems with special emphasis upon the Scandinavian Social Democratic movements and their role in the Nordic society; the Finnish Revolution and Civil War and its legacy and construction and functioning of the Scandinavian welfare states; economic issues; the changing nature and role of the mass media and of educational systems; defense issues; minority problems and immigrants. From time to time new general topics may be added.

Organization of the work:

The class will be conducted as a colloquium. It will meet once a week to hear and to discuss presentations of either an introduction to a general topic or a report on a topic of a more specific nature which falls within the boundaries of the general topic to be explored at the weekly meeting. All participants in the course are expected to concentrate on topics of their choice. They are expected to prepare and deliver to the class reports which will serve as a basis for subsequent discussion in class. These reports should raise questions and issues which will stimulate an exchange of views. The students will also serve as commentators on each others reports. The course will involve no examination, the grading is based on the quality of the reports, their presentation, and general participation in class.
